

How Guns Stop Crimes

The media rarely make a point of reporting stories involving defensive gun use. “In this milieu,” the authors of a new White Paper write, “where criminal gun use makes the evening news, but self-defense cases get little to no coverage, it is understandable why many people would develop negative opinions concerning guns.” But in “Tough Targets: When Criminals Face Armed Resistance from Citizens,” scholars Clayton E. Cramer and David Burnett present their case for reconsidering this stance. They begin by giving an overview of the academic studies of defensive gun use—showing that “the survey data has severe limitations”—before supplementing it with thousands of news reports gathered over an eight-year period. These data offer a distinct advantage in that they provide “a rich set of information about motives, circumstances, victims, and criminals.” The authors go on to examine recent legal trends surrounding self-defense, before exploring the specific manner in which people use guns to fend off criminal attacks. “The overwhelming majority of defensive gun use stories,” they find, “involve ordinary and decent people defending themselves against criminals.” Cramer and Burnett offer dozens of case studies in which everyday citizens exercise judgment and competency when handling a gun. In the end, they acknowledge that bearing arms is clearly not always the solution in criminal confrontations. However, it is impossible to deny that “a great number of tragedies—murders, rapes, assaults, robberies—have been thwarted by self-defense gun uses.” They conclude that, despite the fears of many gun-control advocates, “gun owners stop a lot of criminal mayhem.” Please visit www.cato.org for an interactive map displaying scores of documented stories of defensive gun use.

Renewing Federalism

“Every constitution requires change occasionally,” Michael B. Rappaport, professor of law at the University of San Diego, writes in “Renewing Federalism by Reforming Article V: Defects in the Constitutional Amendment Process and a Reform Proposal” (Policy Analysis no. 691). Unfortunately, the amendment method laid out in Article V of the U.S. Constitution suffers from a significant defect. In his analysis, Rappaport examines the roots of Article V, noting in particular that the national convention method—which allows state legislatures to bypass Congress—was put in place “to prevent a single government entity from having a veto over the passage of an amendment.” This mechanism, however, has never been used because, simply put, it doesn’t work. Rappaport explores the various problems with the national convention method, noting that they each stem from uncertainty—“uncertainty about what the law requires and uncertainty about the actions of the relevant political actors.” The resulting overreliance on the congressional approval method has had an enormous impact on an already far-too-centralized government. “Thus, the increasingly nationalist character of our constitutional charter may not be the result of modern values or circumstances, but an artifact of a distorted amendment procedure,” he writes. Rappaport offers a reform to correct the defect and identifies a realistic path for enacting that reform. By returning power to the states, he hopes to deprive Congress of the effective veto power it currently holds over the amendment process, thereby “helping to restore the federalist character of our Constitution.”

Fair Credit after 40 Years

“Everyone is a potential victim of an inaccurate credit report,” Sen. William Proxmire (D-WI) declared on January 31, 1969, marking the introduction of the Fair Credit Reporting Act (FCRA). While the bill was intended to address the many information issues stemming from credit bureaus at the time, those problems have only multiplied in the 40 years since it became law. In “Reputation under Regulation: The Fair Credit Reporting Act at 40 and Lessons for the Internet Privacy Debate” (Policy Analysis no. 690), Jim Harper, Cato’s director of information policy studies, explains why federal regulation has failed to provide credit reporting that is accurate, responsive, and confidential. Reputation systems such as credit reporting are “complex social mechanism[s],” Harper writes, with a number of “conflicting values that drive them”—including “identification issues, contested notions of relevance, and the surprisingly difficult problem of arriving at ‘fairness.’” Regulators are ill-equipped to make such value-laden judgments, and instead implement rules that have “protected the credit reporting industry from competition, denying consumers the benefits of innovation.” Harper outlines the list of abuses that initially led to the FCRA and examines why contemporary complaints closely mirror them. The experience over the last four decades suggests not only the difficulty in establishing a credit reporting system, but also “a caution about regulating our information economy top-down.” “Deviating from our nation’s founding principles of freedom is as much a mistake in the information arena as in any other,” Harper concludes. ■

MILTON
FRIEDMAN PRIZE FOR ADVANCING LIBERTY

MAY 4, 2012
WASHINGTON, D.C.
WASHINGTON HILTON

The Milton Friedman Prize for Advancing Liberty, named in honor of perhaps the greatest champion of liberty in the 20th century, is presented every other year to an individual who has made a significant contribution to advancing human freedom. Previous winners are the late British economist Peter Bauer; Peruvian economist Hernando de Soto; former prime minister of Estonia Mart Laar; Yon Goicoechea, leader of the pro-democracy student movement in Venezuela; and Iranian writer and journalist Akbar Ganji.
